The correct decision was made in disallowing microsoft to flood schools with their operating systems. If allowed it would have been a brilliant way to further an already massive monopoly. Microsoft doesn't even make computers. They enforce the way most people use computers. This is not the American way. I hope the courts and the government realize this. In the U.S. we take pride in having choices. I love being able to choose amongst an array of deodorant, furniture, or cereal. And, if I don't have a choice I'd rather the government have control over it. Imagine how much money we could budget if microsoft were a government entity.

PS: and there were a few non microsoft computers that weren't affected by Y2K (which cost taxpayers a lot of money). More brilliant minds = more choices = more ideas = more solutions.
